Grape Culture in Virginia.

A correspondent of the Richmond Dispatch gives us the following observations and suggestions upon grape culture in Virginia, which should not fail to engage the attention of those who have or contemplate raising a vineyard:

The land to be devoted to this business, in the beginning, need not be much. One acre will enable one to make a pretty clear start, especially if the beginner is poor or possessed of but little capital. And if, after paying for the vines, the beginner cannot afford a horse to plow the land, it may be dug up with the pick and spade. It does not take a very long time to dig up an acre of land. One hand constantly engaged on it can very nearly or quite prepare it in a week's time. In another week the same hand can plant the vines. But to make sure of it, let us give this one hand one month to do the work in. The work of preparing and planting the ground is then done, and done at an expense for tools, labor, &c., of less than twenty-five dollars. If the planting is done in the fall, which is, perhaps, best—all things considered—the land should be mulched, that is, covered over to the depth of an inch or two with old leaves, pine straw, or something of the sort, which will require the labor of one man and a horse say a week to perform. Nothing more is now needed till the vines begin to start in the spring, which will be early in May; then a cultivator should be run through the land every ten days or so, during the summer, and the ground be kept free from grass or weeds. At this time, that is at the time of the first plowing, the vines should be carefully overhauled, and all the buds or shoots, except the strongest one nearest the trunk, rubbed off, and a small stake, four or five feet in length, stuck up by each one, to which the young shoot should be tied as soon as it has attained sufficient length to enable the operator to do so.

By the time the third plowing (or digging up) if the cultivator has no means of plowing) has been completed, the vine will have probably grown to the length of 15 or 20 inches and made ten joints. If so, they may then be topped, if profit is to be derived from the vines the first year. This will cause the suckers to grow, and at the same time make the vine grow more stocky and heavy, which is of importance to its future value.

Some time in July, not later than the 20th, the vines may be layered; that is, taken down from the stakes, and covered with earth; and if this is properly done, each sucker on them will make a good vine for next year's planting, or to sell to your neighbors, who may also want a vineyard. The one thousand vines planted on this one acre of land, may in this way be made to yield at least five thousand greenwood layers, or vines from layers, worth in any market at least five hundred dollars! Thus it will be seen that a vineyard properly cared for and cultivated, may be made to pay the whole expense of plants, planting and cultivation even the first year, and leave a small margin of profit to the owner besides.

But the work must be carefully and thoroughly done, or it will fail. Every part of the labor must be performed promptly and well, and at the right time. There must be no minding, no half work. It will not answer in grape culture. In fact, I do not believe it answers well in the cultivation of anything.

Now, the fall of the first year has been reached, at an expense, all told, of not over three hundred dollars, which has been more than met by the proceeds, how shall we begin the next (or second) year's work?

After we have carefully taken up our new made vines, and again set up the old one, which is now cut off near the earth, or with one or two buds still attached, the ground is thoroughly cleared and again mulched, and left quietly till spring. The young vines are carefully cut apart, and either immediately set into vineyards, or heated in the ground somewhere, where they can be conveniently had when called for.

It would probably be best to commence the spring's work with the erection of trellis for the proper training of the vine this year. But this is not absolutely necessary. We can use the same stakes that helped us along so well last year for this season. The ground should be well cultivated as for the first year; that is the cultivator should be run through it at least once a fortnight, and all the grass and weeds kept down.

But I do not intend now to trouble the reader with my views of the best manner of training vines the second, third and subsequent years. I will leave that for some future article. Suffice it to say, at present, that there ought to be considerable profit derived from the vines the second year, and more than enough to pay expenses, large as they will necessarily be, if the vines are trellised, and enough to satisfy even a Virginia that his future success is certain, and his vineyard to become a paying institution.

From the foregoing views, three things would appear to be certain: First, That any one who has an acre of land suitable for a vineyard, (and any land that will grow good wheat will grow good grapes,) enough money to purchase one thousand vines, and tools to dig up the land with, is qualified to become a grower of that most delicious of all fruits—the grape.

Second, That with but little more cost for labor than it would require to produce an acre of corn, and with quite as much certainty, a crop of grapes may be produced, which will pay all the expenses of production and leave a margin besides for a profit that would purchase more corn than the same acre of land would produce if planted in corn, and.

PICKLING CUCUMBERS.—As the season for pickling cucumbers has arrived, the following receipts will be found useful to good housewives: Make a pickle, one part vinegar, two parts water, and three parts salt, to which add four ounces of horseradish for every half barrel. Fill the cask, or whatever cask is to hold the pickles, half-full of the pickle, pick the cucumbers with the butt of the stem on, and wipe and put them into the vessel. When it is full place a cloth over the cucumbers and a board nicely fitted over the cloth. A stone should be placed on the board to keep the cucumbers under the pickle. When needed for use wash and put them into vinegar as usual.

BEING the owner of this valuable property, I have taken charge of it on my own account, with a determination of making it a FIRST CLASS HOTEL in all of its departments, having had it thoroughly refitted and furnished so as to accommodate both ladies and gentlemen with all conveniences and comforts.
The table will be kept well supplied at all meals with the best that the MARKET will AFFORD, while the bar will be furnished with the purest of LIQUORS, WINES, &c., and neither surpassed by any in Virginia.
The services of Mr. M. P. Bledsoe have been secured to take charge as principal manager, assisted by Mrs. M. J. Gibbs, both of them highly capable of conducting the business with a determination of making it as such, I can with confidence assure the public that in patronizing the house, they will have no cause to complain.
The omnibus will attend the Depots regularly to take passengers to the house and return them to the depots free of charge. Being centrally located, convenient to the principal business of the place, with first class accommodations, as before stated, I confidently expect a fair share of patronage from my friends and the public.
